Mr. Halk said he considered the honorable Senator's remark, that his course of action would be influenced by such considerations, as indecorous. He therefore insisted on his objection.

The Chark said that the objection came too late.

The bill was then read a second time.

Mr. Halk observed that he desired to ask the honorable Senator who reported this bill—because the fact was particularly dwell upon in the report—whether, had this man been so unfortunate as to have been aslave, it would have made any difference as to his being entitled to a pension for his gallant deeds.

Mr. Ruax, (dem.) of Texas, then addressed the Senate in support of the amendment giving additional aid to the Collins line. He had examined the contracts with Mr. Collins, the amount paid him by the United States, and the amount received from postages. At the end of the second year, the government had expended $250.000 more than it had received. The receipts from postages were increased the second year, and had yielded $190.000 more postages than the first. "Continue it," said the honorable gentlemen, but a year or two longer, and the postages will more than pay the whole expenditures. In addition to the actual receipts from the Collins line, it had been the means of the government deriving a great amount of postages, under the postal treaty, from the Cunard line, which, if the Collins line over British steamers, as a great national triumph. If Mr. Collins were an Englishman, and had accomplished such a victory over the marine of another nation, he would never have aspealed in vain for aid to keep his vessels affoat. He denied that this line was a monopoly. Its losses proved it none. He read numerous extracts from official decuments that these vessels were adaptable to warlike purpores. He urged a liberal policy for the encouragement of steam navigation. Such a policy would be the only means of sustaining our commercial relations with the world. For the English steamers now visited overy port. This policy would also afford the means of resisting any warlike assault, should one court, which was not improbable. Mr. McDorald, (dem.) of Maine, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claima, reported back the Senate bill for the relief of Jane Irwin, of Georgia. It allows her on account of services and losses, by her father, in the war of the revolution, the half pay of a captain, from the time of that war to the death of Colonel Irwin, a period of thirty-five years. This was pushed through, under a suspension of the rules, without debate.

The House then proceeded to dispose of the vast amount of business which has, for the last two months, been accumulating on the Speaker's table. This included sixteen communications from the Executive departments, some of which were laid on the table, and others referred to committees. They were generally of no especial public importance.

A debate sprung up, during which Mr. Stuarr, (dem.) of Mich., said, he learned, incidentally, that the subject of the judges leaving their duties in Utah, had given the President more trouble than any other, during the past year.

President more trouble than any other, during the year.

Mr. Stanton, (dem) of Tenn., said that the Utah judges ought to be paid, as they had been driven away from the territory.

Mr. Streikens, (whig) of Ga., remarked—I am against paying any officers who run away from their duties.

Mr. Stanton said that these judges had to leave. There was no other alternative. He thought no honorable man could remain there, and that the President had scarcely performed his duty in maintaining the laws of that territory.

Mr. Gentry, (whig) of Tenn., observed that persons often beg for places, and afterwards, on obtaining them, neglect their duties. As an instance, one of the judges of Oregon went off to dig gold, and another came to the United States. This is the custom, and persons want their pay without performing their official duties.

After some further debate, the matter was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. Stanly, (whig) of N. C., asked—If we get into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, will it not require two-thirds to take up that bill?
